

The mysterious Antikythera Mechanism, an astrolabe known as the world's first computer, was recovered in 82 complex fragments from a sunken shipwreck off the island of Antikythera in April 1900. Although the mechanism is widely believed to have been constructed by a Greek astronomer around 100 BCE, this origin story has not been confirmed. No other such technologically complex artifact appeared anywhere in Europe until the late 14th century. In 2015AD, BQF Theorists unearthed rare, previously unseen records and unheard sound clips claiming to detail the true origins of the Antikythera Mechanism as designed and constructed by a secret society in ancient Ifriqiya, and its true use as a device for time displacement.

Ancient "time displacement" astrolabes constructed by the Ifriqiyan secret society were used as healing devices to help navigate, or rearrange time into small intervals. The devices could exploit patterns in space-time to displace pain and trauma, casting it into the far future of infinite possibilities, or recast it back into the past in order to refold it and lose it in time.
